

FALL ESSAY SERIES

INTRODUCTION

On behalf of Environmental Law, I am pleased to present our journal's first Fall Essay Series. Recognizing that the field of natural resources and environmental law is constantly evolving, we wanted to create a forum for scholars and practitioners to address these important law and policy developments through a series of short, opinion-based, essays. This first series, which explores the Sackett v. EPA Supreme Court decision from earlier this year, is a collaboration between Professor Joel A. Mintz of Nova Southeastern University, Albert M. Ferlo and Tom Lindley of the nationally recognized law firm, Perkins Coie, and our law school's own Professor Craig Johnston. We believe that our readers will appreciate the authors' candor, as well as the extensive knowledge base and experience that they collectively bring to bear.

Environmental Law is fortunate to have broad faculty support, distinguished contributing authors, and dedicated student editors and members. These advantages, combined with our commitment to only publish the most cutting-edge legal scholarship, are the reasons why our journal continues to be among the country's best and most recognized environmental law reviews.

We hope you enjoy this issue and this essay series.
